

APPENDIX A. [NOTE * P. 40.]

[The following notice also appeared in one of the local journals shortly after Mr. Campbell's death.]

THE LATE COLIN CAMPBELL, ESQ.

Amongst those who are every day removed from us by death, there are few whose loss will be more regretted than the subject of these remarks—the late Colin Campbell, Esq., one of the magistrates for the county, who died at his house, Dingle-mount, Toxteth-park, on Wednesday last.

He was known by those who associated with him in business as one remarkable for his quiet, unobtrusive demeanour, his urbanity, his correctness, his undeviating integrity, and, in short, for all those qualities which place a man high in public confidence, and which most deservedly rewarded him with an ample fortune, with which he retired a few years ago into private life.

His attainments, especially in the higher departments of mathematics, were extensive, and no one was better read in the current literature of the day, or took more delight in discussions upon our elder writers of History and the Belles Lettres.

When a resident in Kendal, he was the chosen friend of the celebrated mathematician Gough, and the intimate of the still more celebrated Dalton, afterwards of Manchester. He has left little of a literary kind behind him, except a choice collection of problems and their solutions, of which he printed a few copies for presents.

Singularly modest and unostentatious, he shrank instinctively from public gaze, and placed his happiness in the performance of domestic duties, and in the society of a few friends who admired and loved him, and in whose hearts his memory will long be enshrined.

22nd October, 1851.
